The, before a Noun substantive, may, for the most part, be omitted in translating into Latin, as being sufficiently included in the Noun itself; except it denote the particular thing mentioned before, and then it is to be translated by hic, haec, hoc; ille, illa, illud; iste, ista, istud, according to the gender of its Substantive, and the particular thing thereby referred to, whether this, that, or the other; or when it is emphatically used to shew that some person or thing is more than ordinarily remarkable; as, Alexander the great, Alexander ille Magnus. I the self same person, ego ille ipse. The same Medea is said formerly to have fled out of Pontus, Media illa ex Ponto quondam profugisse dicitur. The same Fortune governess of human affairs, illa ipsa rerum humanarum domina Fortuna. Then the same excellent man—tum iste vir optimus—

The world, or affairs of the world, Res, rerum, f. pl. res humanae, res hominum. ¶ What a world is this! O tempora! O mores! As the world goeth, quomodo nunc est; ut nunc sit. Is the world comè to this pass? huccine rerum venimus? As all things in this world are uncertain, ut incerta omnia sunt humana. A world of servants, vis innumerabilis servorum. He mindeth nothing in the world, but this one thing, huic uni studet. But you may fear, lest they should not mind the world enough, at enim metuas, ne ab re sint omissiores paulo. They are behind hand in the world, ad inopiam redacti sunt. It is one of the strangest things in the world, nihil mirabilius. There is nothing in the world more childish, omnino nihil est infantius. He is the best man in the world, optimus hominum est homo. Whilst he was in this lower world, dum inter homines erat. He is certainly the very worst man in the whole world, unus est omnium mortalium sinè ullā dubitatione deterimus. The whole world is of that opinion, ad unum omnes idem sentiunt. This is the custom of the world, sic vivitur, ita mos est. Since the world was created, post genus humanum natum, post homines natos. What is the most difficult thing in the world, quod difficillimum est inter mortales. I have too much knowledge of the world, to be a stranger to the power of love, neque ita imperita sum, ut quid agnor valeat, nesciam, Ter. Eun. 5, 2, 42.

 Achelōus, oī. m. A famous river of Epire in Greece, rising out of mount Pindus, and dividing Actolia from Aearnania; hod. Pachicolmo. The poets give it a person, and say he was the son of Oceanus and Tethys; or of the Sun and Earth, as some say, whom Hercules engaged in single combat for Deianira, daughter to the king of Calydonia, to whom both had pretensions, and conquered him, though he changed himself first into a serpent, then into a bull; in which form having lost one of his horns, he was obliged to compound for it by giving Hercules the horn of plenty (Vid. Amalthæa) for it, at last changed himself into a river. The meaning of the fable is, that this was a great river, therefore fitly called the son of Oceanus. That it had many turnings and windings, therefore fitly expres'd by a serpent. The roaring noise which it maketh when it overfloweth its banks, and whereby the adjacent fields become fruitful, answer well to the labours and roaring of a bull; under which figure therefore the poets frequently describe rivers. The two streams, or channels which it had, are the two horns in the fiction; one of which branches, being dammed up by Hercules to prevent its spoiling the country, is described by the cutting off one horn; and the fruitfulness which thereupon succeeded, is the fabulous horn of plenty, Mythol.

They, as they hung with their heads downwards, espying Hercules's backside all black and hairy, one said to the other, Did not our mother warn us of meeting Melampyrgus? Hercules overhearing them, and being taken with the conceit fell a laughing, and set them at liberty. Hence the proverb, Nè in Melampyrgum incidas, Erasim. Beware of catching a Tartar.*

Achilles is, eos, & ei, Hor. per Synecphon. Achilli, Virg. (q. ab Achilleus) m. Ἀχιλλεύς. In voc. Achille. Ov. qu. à Nom. Ἀχιλλεύς primae simpl. The son of Peleus king of Thes-saly, and Thetis, a goddess of the sea. When he was a child, his mother dipped him all over, except the heel she held him by, in the river Styx, to make him invulnerable. He was put to the tuition of Chiron the Centaur, to learn to ride the great horse, and to play upon musick, Vid. Stat. in fin. Achill. His mother was warned by the oracle, that if he went to the wars of Troy with the other princes, he should be slain there; wherefore she sent him away in woman's apparel, and procured he should lie hid amongst the daughters of Lycomedes, where he got with child one of his daughters called Deïdania; of whom was born Pyrrhus: but it being prophesied, that unless Achilles did help, Troy could not be taken; Ulysses by craft found him out. He had certain armour made by Vulcan, at the request of Thetis, which could be pierced by no human force. Out of peevishness for Agamemnon's taking away Briseis from him, he forbore fighting a great while, till the death of his friend Patroclus; to revenge which he went again to battle, slew Hector, and dragged him at his chariot thrice about the walls of Troy, and afterwards sold his body to his father king Priam for a great sum. Concerning which Ennius writ a tragedy, called Hectoris Iytra, à Gr. ἰὺν solvo. On this argument Lucan also writ in his youth, as we learn from Statius, Sylv. 2, 7, 55. At last he was slain by Paris, being shot in the heel, which was not dipped.

It bore the figure of a Gorgon's head, with curling serpents instead of hair, so terrible as to turn all that looked on it into stones. Jupiter wore this as a defence against the Titans, whence the epithet αἰγίοχος. It was worn also by Pallas, vid. Virg. Aen. 8, 435. Melissus king of Crete had two daughters, Amalthea and Melissa, who fed Jupiter when a child, with goats milk and honey. Some say, that the name of the goat was Amalthea, and feign, that when she was dead Jupiter fead her, and made his Aegis of her skin, from which he had the name of Ἀιγίοχος. Jupiter for her good services afterward made her a star, and gave one of her horns to his two nurses, when he was come of age; imparting to it this virtue, that the horn should supply every thing they wished for. Ovid says, that Amalthea was the nymph who nursed him, and that the goat by accident breaking off her horn against a tree, she filled it with flowers and fruits, and put it to Jupiter's mouth; for which he turned her into a star, and honoured the horn with the name of Plenty. Ἀμαλθεΐας κέρα, Prov. Pleno copia cornu, Hor. Epist. 1, 12, 29. though Ovid applieth that too to the horn of Achelous, which Hercules broke off. Ammon, is. m. A name of Jupiter whose temple was in the deserts of Libya, for which reason some have derived it from Ἀμμος, arena; but the name not being Greek, but purely Egyptian, as Plutarch as well as Herodotus in Euterpe affirm, it seemeth more probable to derive it from Ἄμμων the sun, under which name Macrobius hath shewn Jupiter to be worshipped. This is farther confirmed by the manner of his worship, which was under the form of a ram, whence he is stiled corniger. For the word ἄμμος, signifieth both an horn and a ray of light. His oracle was in reputation in the time of Alexander the Great, but began to be neglected in the reign of Tiberius, as Strabo, who then lived, telleth us, and more in the time of Trajan, as we learn from Plutarch's treatise of oracles, and more and more despised as the light of the gospel shined clearer.

Amphion, is. m. The son of Jupiter by Antiope the daughter of Nycteus, who was ravished by Epaphus, as Hygin, or Epopeus, as Pausan in Corinthiacis calleth him; and therefore divorced from her husband Lycus. But afterwards being with child by Jupiter, she was suspected by Dirce, whom Lycus had married, to be still familiar with her husband, who therefore ordered her to be cast into prison; from whence she was delivered by Jupiter, and fled into the mountain Cithaeron; and there, in a place where two ways meet, brought forth twins, which were educated by the shepherds as their own. They called one of them Zethus, ἀπὸ τοῦ ζῆτιν τόπον, and this other Amphion, ὅτι ἐν δίδω ἢ μύτιν αὐτὸν ἔτεκεν. When they were grown up, and understood the injuries done by Dirce to their mother, they tied her to the tail of a mad bull, which dragged her on the cragged rocks, till Bacchus pitying her, turned her into a mountain of the same name. Amphion became an excellent musician, having been presented with a lute by Mercury, on which he played so sweetly, that he brought the stones together wherewith the tower of Thebes was built, Hor. A. P. 394. & Sil. 11, 445. By thus receiving a lute from Mercury is meant, that he was a very eloquent man; and by his bringing the stones together, that he persuaded the rude and barbarous people to join together into one body, and pursue one common interest, building themselves a city, wherein to live together, under certain laws agreed upon by common consent, and fortifying a tower as a defence against their enemies.

M. Antonius, The name of many great Romans. Their family they derive from Antius the son of Hercules. (1) M. Antonius, an eloquent orator, slain with many other great men by the Marian faction. He had two sons, Marcus and Caius, the former whereof was a very profligate man. The latter commanding some troops of Sylla's horse, plundered many places in Greece. He was surnamed Hybrida. (2) Marcus Antonius, son of the former of these, and grandson to the orator, was the fomenter of the civil war. For being tribune, he left the city privately, and fled into Gaul to Cesar. He invaded the province of Brutus, and by the persuasion of Cicero the senate voted him an enemy to the republic. He was beaten by the two consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and young Cesar; but long after he joined in a league with Octavius and Lepidus, and so their government was called a triumvirate. Immediately upon this he vanquished the forces of Brutus and Cassius at Philippī in Macedon. He divorced his wife Fulvia, to marry Octavia sister to Octavius. For the love he bore to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, he divorced her also, which Octavius resenting made war upon him, overcame him in a sea fight at Actium, and forced him to flee to Alexandria, where, being besieged by Cesar, in despair he fell on his own sword. Geres, à gerendis frugibus, Varr. vel à cereo, pro quo nunc dicimus creo, Serv. qu. frugum creatrix] The daughter of Saturn and Ops, the goddess of corn and tillage. She had by Jupiter one daughter, named Proserpina, whom Pluto took with him into his infernal kingdom. Ceres missing her, and not knowing what was become of her, lighted torches on mount Aetna (which, they say, hath burnt ever since) and sought for her all the world over; in her travels she came to king Eleusius, and undertook the tuition of his son Triptolemus. When he was come to age, she provided him a chariot drawn with winged dragons, that he might travel through the world, and teach people husbandry, who lived before on acorns, and other natural productions of the earth. Afterward hearing that her daughter was carried away by Pluto, she went to Jupiter, and complained to him of the injury done her. Jupiter granted that she should return back, upon condition she had tasted nothing in hell whilst she was there; but it being proved by the witness of Ascalaphus, that she had eaten some of a pomgranate, as she walked in Pluto's orchard, all hope of return vanished; wherefore, in revenge, she turned Ascalaphus into an owl. Cicero, ōnis. m. Mark Tully Cicero, father of the Latin eloquence, the greatest orator that ever the Roman state bred, or employed. He was born at a mean town in Italy called Arpinum, but the greatness of his genius soon made him taken notice of, so that making easy steps through the lower honours, he was admitted into the chair of state. He acquitted himself in his consulship so well, that he was the first who ever was honoured with the glorious title of father of his country. He was a great lover of the state, and an unwearied defender thereof; Catiline's conspiracy, and the Agrarian law, are ample testimonies of his vigilance and industry. He was banished the city by Clodius at that time tribune, against whom he made that incomparable speech for Milo; but was with honour restored. In the civil wars he took part with Pompey, as thinking the public liberty lay on that side, to which he always to his last breath shewed himself a constant friend. He had one son, unworthy of such a father, to whom when he was a young student at Athens, he sent his book of Offices, a book which gave the first hand to the invention of Printing in Europe. Daedalus, i. m. [à δαίω, scio; vel δαίδαλλω, vario, Fest.] An Athenian artificer, the most ingenious in the world, whence the proverb, Daedali opera, when we would commend a thing for the curiousness of the work: he invented the saw, the ax, the plummet, the augour, glue, cement, sails for ships, the sail-yard; and statues he so contrived as to make the eyes move, as if living; being accused of the death of Perdix his nephew, he fled into Crete, and there made the Labyrinth, into which Minos put him and his son Icarus, because he had made a cow of wood, wherein Pasiphae putting herself became guilty of monstrous lewdness. He seeing no way of escape, desired feathers and wax, to make a present, as he pretended, for the king; but therewith he made himself and his son wings, and so flew from Crete to Sardinia, and from thence to Cumae, where, having lost his son by the way, he built a temple to Apollo. The meaning of the fable is, that Daedalus being privy to the adultery of Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, with his servant named Taurus, was cast into prison with his son Icarus; but they, and some other discontented persons flying from Crete in some small vessels, Minos pursued them so briskly, that the ship in which Icarus was, split against the rocks: but Daedalus having found out the use of sails, got first to Sicily, the king using oars only; and so escaped the fury of his pursuer; whence the proverb, Remigiis Daedaleis, to signify a thing done with dexterity and speed. *Vid. When Philip had besieged Athens, he promised to raise the siege, if they would give in hostage ten orators. Demosthenes told them that the wolves desired a league with the shepherds, upon this condition, that the cause of strife might be taken away, which was the shepherds' mastiffs; this being granted, the wolves without fear made havock of the sheep. So would Philip do with you, said he, if once you deliver to him your watchmen, your orators. Hōmērus, i. m. [Ὅμηρος, i. e. obfes, quod in bello inter Colophonios & Smyrnenfes obfes datus fuerit] An ancient, and most excellent Greek poet, so famous, that seven of the greatest cities of Greece contended to be the place of his birth, viz. Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, and Athens. That he travelled all over Greece, is manifest by his ready use of all the dialects, though he chiefly used the Ionian; and the several pieces, writ probably in the places and cities where they were found, and in process of time gathered, and stitched together, are from thence called Παρυδιαί. He is called Melesigenes, from the river Meles, near which he was born; which river is on the reverse of coins struck by several cities in honour of him. The poets often call him Maenides; either because he was the son of Maeon, or rather born in Maeonia; Smyrna, near the river Meles, seeming to have the best title to be his birth place. *Vid.
